Interpersonal communication in contemporary family.

Abstract

The article is especially concentrated on threats to the family which are results from a bad communication. It could be very dangerous for the contemporary family. In the interest of proper development of the family, the most important demands for a family policy should be: increasing the authority of the family, fulfillment of the educational process, the obligation to care for the health of children and young people and showing positive examples of moral conduct. Polish family because of the transformation undergone rapid change. As we know, the family is an age-old community at least two people. It is the first and most important lesson of life. This fact made it to be flawless. To do this, the family should strengthen communication between members. Interpersonal communication leads to good relationships in the family, helps to avoid conflicts and barriers.

Key words: family, interpersonal communication, communication in family, dialogue, social relationships, man as a social being